YESTERDAY'S CONCERTS.

There were three concerts yesterday which in respect both of the beauty of the music and the excellence of its performance, were calculated to charm, even toward the close of a season which has been a little too generous in its offerings. The first of these concerts was the second of Mr. Van der Stucken's classical orchestral matinées at Chickering Hall. The programme disclosed no effort to astonish, either by selection or arrangement, but it was full of delightful music, and full of variety as well. It opened with Mozart's symphony in G minor, which, under Mr. Van der Stucken's direction, was played with splendid spirit, precision of execution and much beauty of expression. After the symphony Mr. Fischer, of the German Opera, sang an old-fashioned florid air of Boieldieu's from the opera "Jean de Paris." The air is one of the admired basso's battle-horses, and indeed he has few pieces in his repertory which display his skill in vocalization and the beauty of his voice to better advantage. In two of Schubert's songs ("Der Wandern" and "Mehr"), which he sang later, however, he gave a higher pleasure because of the loveliness and sincerity of feeling with which he impelled them. The other solo performance was Chopin's piano-forte concerto in F minor, played by Alexander Lambert, and played, too, with much taste, intelligence and technical skill. The concert came to an end with a set of three pieces from Gluck's operas arranged in the form of a suite. The concert was one of the most delightful that Mr. Van der Stucken has given since he came to New-York.

In the same concert-room the Beethoven Quartette Club gave the last of its concerts of chamber music. The illness of Mrs. Dannreuther, wife of the leader of the club, who had expected to assist at the concert, compelled a disappointing change in the programme to those who are anxious to observe the progress-making by native composers. A quintet by Mr. Chadwick, of Boston, was to have been played, but Schumann's model work of the same class was substituted with Mr. Hoffman at the piano-forte. Mr. Hansen sang four songs by Klenzé, Ries, Lassen and Jensen, to the great delight of the audience, but the most interesting feature of the concert was the first flat minor, op. 30, by Tchaikowsky, which had its first performance in New-York on this occasion. It was capitally played and proved to be fascinatingly beautiful in mood and originality, with some striking after novelties of effect. Its second movement is a bewitching and playful allegro, the third a funeral march of profound feeling, while the whole being made a part of the club's permanent repertoire.

At Steinway Hall in the evening Paul Madden, a local violinist of good parts, who disclosed the sermons of his aims by avoiding solos and playing mostly in groups, gave the last of his series of solo performances. The list contained only three numbers, but they were good ones: Beethoven's trio for strings, op. 9, No. 1; Schubert's sonata in B flat, and Rubinstein's piano-forte trio, op. 52.
